

Jon DeLuca is a Director at Doctor's Associates/Subway Restaurants, a philanthropist, and a dad. Jon has been heavily influenced by his father, Fred DeLuca, co-founder of the Subway brand, which is the world's largest restaurant chain. Fred had a philosophy and core values that were centered around providing opportunity to many. He believed that helping people improve their skills, become self-sufficient and hone their entrepreneurial spirit were the best ways to help them improve their lives.

Jon embodies those same core values: Family, Community and Opportunity. He is proud that Subway continues to be a company where many different families work together in the business. He takes equal pride in the fact that Subway owners are very involved in their local communities all around the world. Subway has been there to help feed first responders during recent devastating natural disasters.

Jon has been heavily involved in charitable causes related to health and education. As a Director of the Frederick A. DeLuca Foundation, he implements the foundation's mission of providing education, job training, and skill development opportunities to young Americans. He also serves on the South Florida Board of Directors for the American Heart Association, where he helps raise awareness about the importance of healthier lifestyles.

In his personal life, Jon values family and togetherness. Though his family is now widely dispersed from the New York roots where his Italian ancestors settled a century ago, Jon makes sure his extended family stays connected through family gatherings and other traditions. He is committed to making sure that these Italian family values get instilled in future generations.